The concept of a “workcation,” in which people travel to a vacation destination but work while on the trip in order to save paid time off, has been around for many years. However, “bleisure” – which merges the words leisure and business – adds extra days at the beginning or end of a business trip, thereby offering employees some additional rest and relaxation before or after diving into work.

Bleisure trips became very popular a few years ago after travel restrictions were lifted and a growing number of workers started returning to business trips. Often wanting to take their loved ones with them for a respite from the isolation everyone had been subjected to, these trips evolved into hybrids of work and pleasure.

Chrisy Ranallo, Director of Sales & Marketing at Skytop Lodge in the Pocono Mountains of northeast Pennsylvania, hosts many bleisure travellers. She explains, “Many business events have a full itinerary in a conference room setting, so they have not been able to explore the 5,500 acres and everything we have to offer. We often get requests for the group guests to extend their stays and invite their families for the weekend, since we are an easy two-hour drive from Philadelphia, New York and New Jersey. Our resort offers an array of summer activities and breathtaking views for unwinding.”

Research indicates that nearly half of American workers now embrace the concept of bleisure travel, and bleisure trips currently reach a worldwide market value of nearly $600 billion. Research indicates this market is expected to grow by around 500% or more over the next decade.

According to Routespring, a top-rated travel management platform that caters to the growing bleisure travel market, around 40% of business trips are extended for bleisure travel. Bleisure trips have seen significant growth in the last decade, with estimates suggesting a 20% increase from 2016. This trend has continued to accelerate, driven by factors like changing work dynamics, the desire for more personal and work balance and the relative affordability of adding personal time to business trips. Why laughter is good for you

From reducing stress to enhancing social connections, the health benefits of laughter are backed by science.

Laughter is a simple, yet powerful tool to enhance our physical and mental wellbeing.

People often say that laughter is the best medicine, and it seems that this saying may be more accurate than we realise.

- 5 Ongoing trials are exploring whether “comedy-on-prescription” can boost mental health, lower NHS expenses, and offer an alternative to antidepressants.

Craic Health has secured grant funding to develop comedy-based interventions, such as stand-up shows and workshops, to help isolated individuals reconnect with their communities.

The initiative aims to cut mental health-related costs while fostering collaboration between the comedy industry, local communities, and the government.

- 10 In a world where stress and anxiety are ever-present, how can laughter contribute to improving both our mental and physical health?

Releases endorphins

- 15 “Laughing releases endorphins, which help to reduce stress, depression and anxiety,” says Alison Goolnik, integrative psychotherapist at Therapy Here. “It boosts your mood and can distract you from any stress or pain.

“Laughter may be a simple act, but it is a powerful tool that can easily be used to improve your mindset, strengthen positive beliefs and enhance physical and mental wellbeing.”

- 20 “When we engage in fun and laughter, the brain releases dopamine, a key chemical that boosts mood and activates learning centres,” says Lowri Dowthwaite-Walsh, cognitive behavioural psychotherapist and honorary senior lecturer at the University of Central Lancashire. “This enhances executive functions such as memory, problem-solving, and concentration, making it easier to absorb and process new information.”

Enhances pain tolerance

- 25 “Laughter triggers the release of feel-good endorphins, our body’s natural painkillers, helping to relax muscles and reduce discomfort,” says Dowthwaite-Walsh. “It also shifts our nervous system from a ‘fight or flight’ state to a more adaptive response known as ‘tend-and-befriend,’ which promotes resilience and relaxation.”

Strengthens bonds

- 30 “Laughter is highly contagious,” says Dowthwaite-Walsh. “When we laugh with others, we strengthen social bonds and create more opportunities for spontaneous joy.”
- “Research shows that meaningful social connections are one of the most powerful protective factors for mental wellbeing.”

Lowers stress hormones

- 35 “Cortisol, the body’s main stress hormone, spikes when we’re anxious or overwhelmed, and laughter brings it down almost instantly,” says Dr Naheed Ali, senior contributor at Vera Clinic, and author of Living with Metabolic Syndrome. “It shifts the body out of a stress response and into a relaxed state, which is why people feel lighter after a good laugh, even if nothing about their situation has changed.”

Eases tension

- 40 “A deep belly laugh physically releases tension in the muscles, sometimes for up to 45 minutes,” says Ali. “It’s like a natural antidote to the stiffness and tightness that builds up from stress.”
- 45 “Even people dealing with chronic pain sometimes notice that laughter helps them feel looser and more comfortable.”

Supports heart health

- “When you laugh, your heart rate and blood pressure increase briefly, but then they drop – kind of like a mini workout for your cardiovascular system,” says Ali. “This helps improve circulation and reduces the strain on blood vessels over time.”
- 50 “Studies even suggest that regular laughter can lower the risk of heart disease.”
